The residency program, based at Lee Memorial Hospital with The Florida State University College of Medicine as its institutional sponsor, accepts eight new doctors each year for a three-year residency. Medical school graduates are required to complete residency training in their specialty of choice to become independently practicing physicians.

These new resident physicians were selected after a rigorous vetting and interview process of the more than 1,500 applications received from U.S. medical students and physicians from around the world for the 8 available positions.

“We are very proud of the strong interest in our program as proven by the number of applications received,” said Alfred Gitu, M.D., Program Director of the Family Medicine Residency Program at Lee Health. We’ve matched with eight outstanding candidates this year as our program continues to grow with residents who are dedicated, compassionate and academically accomplished. “

Lee Health launched the residency program in 2012 to address the shortage of primary care physicians in Southwest Florida.

About 60 percent of family medicine residents practice medicine in the same area where they undergo training. Of the 18 Lee Health program graduates, 12 (67 percent) have chosen to remain in the region to practice.
